

The SP500 has a respite due to different Keynesian craftiness which allows it to mean testing his line of neck. Interesting because precisely it's the politic of reflation by increase of the money supply which makes down the dollar and up gold.

But take care, when too many banknotes are made to boost the economy, the first "signal of the arrival of problems" it l' obviously the increase of the gold followed actually by a disaster.

So the parallel increase, of SP500 and gold, explain itself very well but it risks to not last for a long time.

Just a citation (but I don't remember who says it): "Inflation it's like the toothpaste, it is easy to go out it of the tube but very difficult to put back it inside"
